Faculty of Law

Law cannot be taught as an entirely theoretical subject. I believe that students need to be prepared to function in the real world. While theory is important, it is vital that students be given some instruction on how the theory squares with practice. To this end, I believe that the syllabus must be realistic and deal with current problems faced by the profession, not theoretical ones that are of concern mainly to academic commentators.

What Students Say...

"A wealth of experience, able to highlight both the theoretical and practical aspect of criminal law. Enjoyed the discussion questions and the opportunity to role play as both DPP and Defense counsel. I enjoyed, especially the background context which he shares on each case, which informs how the case was decided. He also highlights potential weaknesses in the law, such as the defence of duress and its limitations."

"Very passionate teacher who imparts his wisdom, not just mere theoretical knowledge of the subject."
